Getting the Most from Your Planner

Time just seems to slip away... Time goes by so fast... Where does the time go? Do you find yourself saying this? Do you wonder where the day went? Do you wonder where the year went? Do you find yourself in the midst of November feeling as though it was surely only March a few weeks ago?

If so, you're not alone. In these hectic times, nearly everyone seems to feel that time is flashing by. Each year seems to pass more quickly, with less to show for it. Our tasks multiply, yet sometimes weeks go by that leave us shaking our heads, feeling as if we've been running a race, yet wondering, "What exactly did I do?"

For writers, our common lament is that we never seem to have time to take on the projects that are dearest to our hearts. Our dreams remain dreams; our goals seem no nearer to fulfillment than when we first wrote them down. Perhaps it's that novel that we yearn to begin—or to finish. Perhaps it's that nonfiction book or memoir. Perhaps it's the desire to go "full-time" as a freelancer, and earn a living wage doing what we love best. We read endless articles on how to "make time to write," yet that time seems more elusive than ever.

A Writer's Year can help. It's the only planner designed specifically for writers. It recognizes that a writer's "working day" doesn't start at nine and end at five. For many, it only begins at five, and may not end until well after midnight.

A Writer's Year is based on the recognition that "planning" and "creativity" aren't mutually exclusive. Our creative "right brain" and our organizational "left brain" aren't antagonists; they're partners. And without planning, we risk losing hours of potential creative time, simply because we're not in control of it and often don't even know "where it all goes."

My husband is fond of pointing out that "you can't manage what you can't measure." You can't manage your time until you know how it is spent. This planner can help you manage this most precious resource. And if, in your writing career, "time is money," it can help you become not only more productive but also more profitable.

Here are some ways to make this planner work for you, and help you recapture the time you need to achieve your writing goals:

1) Record your deadlines. Knowing what is coming up is the first step in scheduling your obligations. A Writer's Year enables you to note deadlines on the actual due-date, and also make a list of weekly and monthly deadlines at a glance.

External deadlines are relatively easy to keep track of. But what about projects that don't have "real" deadlines? Setting your own deadlines on projects you want to complete can help you schedule time for them amidst other, externally imposed requirements. Conversely, tracking your deadlines will help you avoid scheduling tasks that aren't so urgent in the same timeframe. For example, if it takes you a week to write an article and a week to write a chapter of your novel, then a month in which you have three article deadlines is not the best month to set a goal of writing four novel chapters! In short, knowing what you "have" to do helps alleviate the stress of feeling that you're not meeting your other goals.

2) Keep "to-do" lists. I'm a firm believer in the power of the "to-do" list, which is why I've set up a place for this at the beginning of each week. To-do lists aren't just useful for reminding you of what you actually need to accomplish in a given day or week. They are a wonderful way of helping you track what you have accomplished. That surge of satisfaction you get when you cross something off the list isn't the least bit silly; it's a visual reminder that you have, in fact, achieved your objective. Hence, your to-do list serves in its own way as your achievement list (something I've also provided a place for).

3) Track your achievements. Many of us go through the days and weeks at a frantic pace, but when the end of the day or week or month arrives, we look back and wonder, "what exactly did I accomplish?" We know we were working at top speed, yet it's hard to remember just what we did—often because we did so many things.

I've gotten in the habit of writing down my achievements at the end of each day, along with any other major activities that took a chunk of my time (like running errands or handling a phone call from a family member). It's not a "brag" list (though sometimes it may have a brag or two); rather, it's a reminder that all that "running in place" really did result in things getting done. Otherwise, it's easy to feel as if one is wasting time, simply because one can't recall just where all that time went.

4) Track project and billable hours. If you write for others—creating copy, business materials, technical writing, etc.—chances are that you need to track your billable hours. One of the most obvious uses of a planner like A Writer's Year is to note what you did when, and how long it took. But be specific: don't just note that you spent two hours working on "The Johnson Project." What, exactly, did you do? If you spent half an hour conducting an interview and another hour writing up your interview notes, put that down. This will also help you, in the future, to be able to make more accurate estimates of the time that will be required for future projects.

While many freelance projects don't involve billable hours, tracking your time is still useful when writing articles or other types of submissions. It's easy to look at what one is being paid for a piece without taking into account how long it takes to produce that piece. It's important to remember that a $200 article that requires ten hours of work is no more lucrative than a $20 article that requires only one—but we won't know which projects are the most profitable unless we actually know how long it takes to complete them. Tracking non-billable project hours is a great way to determine what types of work "pay off" and what types are simply time-wasters.

5) Track your submissions. I've included a submission tracker at the end of this book. It's ideal for keeping a record of what you've sent out, where, and when; when you've followed up; what the response has been; and how much you have been paid.

6) Track everything else. The question we seem to ask most often is "where does the time go?" This doesn't have to be a rhetorical question; we can find out. If you're constantly feeling that the days are going by without getting you any closer to your writing goals; if you're constantly wondering why you've managed to be "busy" all day without getting done the things you wanted to get done; then, consider using A Writer's Year to track exactly what you do all day.

I mean this literally. Note when you get up. Note when you actually "start" your day (i.e., after showering, getting dressed, having breakfast, etc.). If you have a job, note when you leave the house and when you return home. If you don't have an outside "day job," track the other things that occupy your time: running errands, handling parenting issues, cooking meals, etc. Track time spent on phone calls, paying bills, watching television. Track it all.

What we so often find is that we sit down to "quickly" check e-mail—and blink to find that the entire morning is gone. Or, we'll just "check a few Facebook pages"—ditto. The only way to begin reallocating your time to the tasks you want to accomplish is to find out where it's actually going first. As I said above, we can't manage what we can't measure—so if we start to feel that somehow we're losing control of our time management, the only way to get it back is to begin by "measuring."

Regardless of how you use A Writer's Year, I hope you'll find it a useful tool to help you achieve your writing goals, whatever those may be! I wish you every success in the year to come—and hope that, when next autumn rolls around, you'll be able to look back on your writing year as time well spent!

"People... think there's something magical about writing, that you go up in the attic at midnight and cast the bones and come down in the morning with a story, but it isn't like that. You sit in back of the typewriter and you work, and that's all there is to it."
 — Harlan Ellison

“All writing is difficult. The most you can hope for is a day when it goes reasonably easily. Plumbers don’t get plumber’s block, and doctors don’t get doctor’s block; why should writers be the only profession that gives a special name to the difficulty of working, and then expects sympathy for it?” – Philip Dullman

"Writing is hard work, not magic. It begins with deciding why you are writing and whom you are writing for. What is your intent? What do you want the reader to get out of it? What do you want to get out of it. It's also about making a serious time commitment and getting the project done." – Suze Orman

“Book love, my friends, is your pass to the greatest, the purest, and the most perfect pleasure that God has prepared for His creatures. It lasts when all other pleasures fade. It will support you when all other recreations are gone. It will last you until your death. It will make your hours pleasant to you as long as you live.” – Trollope

"I should think it extremely improbable that anyone ever wrote simply for money. What makes a writer is that he likes writing. Naturally, when he has written something, he wants to get as much for it as he can, but that is a very different thing from writing for money." – D.C. Wodehouse

"Oh it is only a novel... In short, only some work in which the greatest powers of the mind are displayed, in which the most thorough knowledge of human nature, the happiest delineation of its varieties, the liveliest effusions of wit and humour, are conveyed to the world in the best chosen language." – Jane Austen

“A writer is a person who cares what words mean, what they say, how they say it. Writers know words are their way towards truth and freedom, and so they use them with care, with thought, with fear, with delight. By using words well they strengthen their souls... And their words make the souls of their readers stronger, brighter, deeper.” – Ursula Le Guin

"Few of us know what fairy palaces we may build of beautiful thought, proof against all adversity. Bright fancies, satisfied memories, noble histories, faithful sayings, treasure-houses of precious and restful thoughts, which care cannot disturb, nor pain make gloomy, nor poverty take away from us, houses built without hands, for our souls to live in." — John Ruskin

"If you want to be a writer, you must do two things above all others: read a lot and write a lot... reading is the creative center of a writer's life... you cannot hope to sweep someone else away by the force of your writing until it has been done to you."
 — Stephen King

"Do what thou lovest; paint or sing or carve. Do what thou lovest, though the body starve! Who works for glory oft may miss the goal. Who works for money merely starves the soul; works for work's sake, then, and, it may be, these other things'll be added unto thee." – Anonymous
